

The background features a stylized, muted illustration of a party scene. In the center, a large, glowing, textured sphere is surrounded by several people in various poses. The overall color palette is soft and pastel, with a textured, paper-like appearance.

"We all know those individuals who just have that power to seduce you. Some definitely have it more than others, and it gets dangerous when they know how to use their power to its full potential. They're like bad superheroes - they can do just as much harm as good."

"This painting started as off as a commentary on the dating world. No matter what age you're at, whether you're starting out in your 20s or getting yourself back out there in your 40s, it's the same thing. The more I look at it, the more I think dating reflects life in the business world as well, and whoever you are dealing with, wherever you are in your life, it seems to me to be the same hell, different devils."

"This is a painting about the ones you know are a total mistake from the beginning. Everything in your body is telling you to run, but you can't; you're frozen - maybe even hypnotized. You know she's gonna be so exciting, so delicious, and so bad for your health."

'These Cost?' is a satirical piece based on the idea that a beautiful woman never has to pay for a drink. It came about because of a comment made in a bar one night when I was attempting to get the attention of the bartender and I got overlooked. The woman who was served ahead of me received her drink and the bartender told her the price. She looked at him strangely and looked over at me as if I was going to pay for it and asked "these cost?". At that moment another man stepped in and paid for her drink. I was annoyed and impressed at the same time."
